“Ebonics” is a style of language use by African Americans in English. Some linguists (語言學家) consider Ebonics from the words “ebony” and “phonics (語音學)” to refer to all expressions, communication, and pronunciation used by this group of Black people.

Some African Americans speak English with a special intonation (語調) to their friends on informal social situations. They change to use standard English in formal circumstances such as at work. Ebonics has its roots in the African language based on an interesting aspect of the African American culture. Some famous people like movie stars and singers may strengthen their Ebonics to call attention to their viewpoints, or reflect their social classes.

Generally speaking, Ebonics can be recognized in several ways. One of the features is that people speak it often drop some sound. “Working” becomes “workin” or “isn’t” becomes “ain’t” and “I am going to” becomes “Ima tell you.”

Some linguists also found that the Black with low levels of education often use Ebonics. Thus, people think Ebonics is low-grade. It is not just a shortened form of Standard English. Instead, it is related to African American culture.
